Social Thinking Webinar

Teaching Kids How We Work & Learn in Groups

60 minutes / 1 contact hour of instruction. Original webinar took place August 24, 2021. The recording is available to be watched any time at www.socialthinking.com/webinars

One of the weird things about the normal school day is that we expect kids to work easily—even comfortably—in groups, often without explaining the power and benefits of learning within a group. In this webinar attendees learned explicit ways to help students explore the value of face-to-face (and online) group learning, especially when the interventionists (parents, teachers, clinicians, therapists) focus on building students' social emotional competencies rather than “trying to get kids to behave.” Participants also discovered three steps to help tweens and teens become increasingly aware of their social emotional self-regulation.

This free webinar explored:

- Why and how we learn in groups
- Focusing on developing social competencies instead of managing student behavior
- Three steps toward developing social self-awareness and self-regulation
